The session, conducted by Dr. Prashant Solanke, aimed at equipping the faculty with the necessary knowledge and skills to effectively handle and respond to health crises and emergencies in the community.

The program started at 9:00 AM and continued until 5:00 PM. Dr. Solanke, a renowned expert in public health and emergency management, led the session with great enthusiasm and expertise. His lecture covered various aspects of emergency preparedness, ranging from understanding the types of health crises that can affect communities to strategies for effective management and response.

Throughout the day, Dr. Solanke focused on the importance of proactive planning and communication in mitigating the impact of emergencies. He discussed key concepts such as risk assessment, resource management, and the role of healthcare professionals in community resilience during disasters. Real-life case studies were also shared to demonstrate how communities can be better prepared to handle health-related emergencies, including natural disasters, epidemics, and other crises.

The program was interactive, with Dr. Solanke encouraging active participation from the faculty. He also emphasized the need for ongoing training and awareness in emergency preparedness, underlining that such programs should be a regular part of faculty development in health education institutions.

By the end of the session, participants were not only more knowledgeable about the technical aspects of emergency response but also more aware of their critical roles in ensuring the health and safety of the community during emergencies. The day concluded with a Q&A session where Dr. Solanke addressed various queries from the attendees, providing further insights into the practical implementation of emergency response strategies.
